- 110 Imperial Sèvres Tête-à-Tête Set, open-work sides of the most delicate workmanship, decorated with neat gold bands.
 - "The pieces termed reticulated "Réticulé," for the reason that they seem as enveloped in a net-work of porcelain, are very difficult to make, and consequently of a high price, for this reason only few manufacturers of porcelain, working for the trade, have tried to imitate them.
 - "The piece called Chinese reticulated tea-pot (Théirè chinoise réticulé), offers the most difficulties. This tea-pot is composed of five pieces, two for the exterior and three for the interior, the outside pieces that are reticulated are first molded and then shaped on the wheel. The inner pieces are thrown without being molded. When the outside pieces are dry, they are joined together with barotine or gum water. The cutting out of the net-work only requires dexterity. To begin with, all the holes are pierced with a drill, which has a heel to it, preventing it from going in far enough to reach the inside piece. The cuts are finished with a sharp flat blade. The spout is inserted through an opening reserved for it, while the handle is only secured to the outside covering of porceiain."
